

ABSTRACT

When environmental agreements are made at the international level, they most often are multilateral and embody public good characteristics. Improving upon inefficient laissez-faire equilibria requires voluntary cooperation for which the concept of core in game-theory provides optimal outcomes that have interesting properties against free riding. The paper explores methods that can be used to identify the core of an international agreement where environmental issues are looked upon.