

ABSTRACT

This study seeks to investigate weather- crime relationship in context of India. To understand the relationship between two variables, analysis is performed using crime data sourced from NCRB and weather data sourced from IMD.

Negative binomial regression count model is employed to estimate the relationship between weather and crime.

It has been found out that temperature fluctuations are associated with an increase in all types of crime, the impact being strongest on property crimes.